QUOTE

"I spent a lot of time in the Queens library because it has a lovely view of most of the city... I would pick buildings out through the window to try and explore closer up because I hadn't really explored much of the city... I was using the library as a telescope of sorts to try to pinpoint what I would be doing outside of the library and engaging with the wider community."

EX LIBRIS AD MEMORIAM

QUOTE

"The love that's been put into a lot of the architecture of libraries... When I think about when I've gone to America or places more local, we often visit the library because it tells you about a place, it tells you how much do they value their culture. Maybe a little town, maybe a big city, or stepping inside the New York Public Library. It's just awesome."

"There was an equality about everybody there that I kind of liked as well. You do find that public libraries are used by people of all ages and all backgrounds, and there's this egalitarian aspect of libraries. And you can see when you look into why they were set up, you know, that egalitarian impulse is so strong."

"Going back to my childhood... I was allowed to borrow one book a week and take it home. So, this was a big thrill. But I remember the very first book I borrowed was something like the Cat in the Hat. And I took it home, and you know, there's only about one word on every page. And so, I'd read it by that evening, and it dawned on me I would have to wait a whole week to get another book.

"I had weekly visits to the library with my younger sister. She's three years younger than me. So, the two of us would be of an age where we could go on the bus on our own, and then off we would go to the local library, which was probably about 5 miles away... And then there was this ritual. So, go to the library, change our library books around, and then we had to get the bus back. "

"There is a piece of toast in the theatre collection: It's so fragile, and it was a sort of fairly avant garde theatre group that had used this piece of toast as their marketing. We knew we wouldn't be allowed to bring out the piece of toast. It's so fragile now. But by that time, the theatre collection had light scanned a 3D photograph... But also we had the fun of trying to see if well, perhaps we can do our own piece of toast."

EX LIBRIS AD MEMORIAM

QUOTE

"Because I was going from primarily using a Public Library to primarily using a university library, I expected some change and I was using for different purposes... there was a change in the relationship. Probably it was just the nature of the beast. If you like, it was inevitable. It would happen... It went from being a place I'd go to find a stories to a place that I'd go to find information."

"My granddaughter, because she's three, she loves going to the library and picking out her own books and having her own library card. I mean, my grandson's only just over one, so he's not there yet. But she's already used to the idea that there's this place you can go to get different books. All sets of books, every couple of weeks or so, and she really looks forward to her trip."

"We've seen massive funding cuts. Our local library which we used to walk through with our children has closed. And I actually don't know where the nearest Public Library is to me now. Which is a shame, and I should do. But doing that and the restricting the funding, you're restricting access. And I think it's a vital resource."

"I don't actually have a problem with people making notes in books... And I know that library's frown on people doing that. I actually wish they didn't, you know, because I think if you pick up a book and you see what someone else has underlined, what they think is important. That's actually a useful piece of information. It's a bit of a meta information about the book."

EX LIBRIS AD MEMORIAM

QUOTE

" My favorite aspect is engaging with the readers. When preparing materials, you become an 'expert' for the day. It could be the penguin collection or the feminist archives or Brunel. Its a bit of a carousel - in the best sense. You get that rich dipping your toe into many different subjects since we have such huge and exciting collections."

EX LIBRIS AD MEMORIAM

QUOTE

"What's so special about the archives is that it is for people. It's going to be relevant to someone's research or interests. There is only so much that can be located or found, this is a small snippet. Noting will last forever but we do our best in the here and now. You feel like you are contributing toward something. "

QUOTE

"It was given to special collections by Professor John Nye. The story goes that he went to meet Einstein in the US, but he wasn't available. Whomever he met gave him this bit of Einstein's notes. People tend to like it."

"The nice thing about special collections is that we're not just for people linked to the University of Bristol. We're here for people all over the world. "

EX LIBRIS AD MEMORIAM

QUOTE

"I can just pull something out like the magazines there from the Women's movement in the 1970's. I'll be talking to groups of students who weren't around at that time and it's a really lovely connection between people and things. And they realise that the things we were talking about in the 70s we're still talking about now. "

QUOTE

"When something's been used, we then put it away. Putting it on a shelf or in a box is almost like putting it to bed. It's about ensuring that they are available for the future. There's a real sense of caring for something. "

QUOTE

" This is the last thing I did. We collect campaign election leaflets from parliamentary elections and the earliest are from the mid 19th century. These are the most recent ones from Tiverton and Honiton and I just put them on the catalogue. This was an important one because it was the largest swing in parliamentary election history."
